I was wondering, is there a better way to write this? var status = $q.defer(); status = status.promise; status.success(1); status.error(2); return status; A: Your code is semantically equivalent to the following code: status.then(function(val) { // do something return 1; }, function(err) { return 2; }); So the only reason to keep your code around is if you just don't want to use the power of promises. If that's the case, I'd personally replace it with the following code: return $q.when(1, 2); I'd also note that 82157476af
